SCOTCH WHISKY REGIONS

Scotch Whisky Regions

FIVE PROTECTED REGIONS - MANY HOUSE STYLES

Region is a useful starting point rather than a rigid flavour rule. Cask choice, peat, fermentation and distillation can move a whisky far beyond the stereotype of its postcode.

SPEYSIDE

Often fruit-led and polished: apple, pear, honey, vanilla and spice are common, with sherry-seasoned oak playing an important role in many houses.

HIGHLAND

The broadest regional spectrum, ranging from light and floral to waxy, coastal, rich or smoky. House style matters enormously.

LOWLAND

Traditionally lighter and softer, with cereal, grass, flowers, cream, ginger and gentle sweetness often appearing in the profile.

ISLAY

Celebrated for peat smoke, iodine, brine and maritime power - although unpeated and lightly peated exceptions are an important part of the island.

CAMPBELTOWN

Historically robust and oily, often combining salt, smoke, fruit, vanilla and toffee in a distinctly coastal style.

A note on the Islands: Skye, Orkney and other islands are useful stylistic groupings, but they are not a separate protected Scotch Whisky region; legally they sit within the Highland region.

The Macallan

WOOD, SHERRY AND MATURATION

Founded in 1824 in Speyside, The Macallan has built its identity around the relationship between spirit and exceptional oak. The Solange selection progresses from Double Cask through mature sherry-led and collector expressions.
